Many young Asians are uncertain that they will have better lives with their parents

On the watch

By Peter Singer

Singer says the addictive nature of tobacco fuels efforts to educate against it, and stronger regulation of the drug is the only way to save lives

The influence of nations states in the globalised world is diminishing. No country, not even Germany, is large enough to be a world power on any key political or economic topic. The US, for all the importance it holds as an ideological role model, is all the more important that we have to develop a European dimension to balance its power.

It is said that Germany, as one of the two largest economies in the eurozone, is in a position to stabilise the crisis. Whereas the US is too large, South Korea too small, the Chinese economy too dependent on exports, and India too weak, Germany is well placed: it is both large enough to stabilise the economic situation, and small enough to allow others to gain from it.

The significant changes which occur are managed by the power centres in Europe such as the French, the British and the Germans, who have the necessary leverage to stabilise the situation.

The influence of nations states in the globalised world is diminishing. No country, not even Germany, is large enough to be a world power on any political or economic topic. The US, for all the importance it holds as an ideological role model, is all the more important that we have to develop a European dimension to balance its power.

It is said that Germany, as one of the two largest economies in the eurozone, is in a position to stabilise the crisis. Whereas the US is too large, South Korea too small, the Chinese economy too dependent on exports, and India too weak, Germany is well placed: it is both large enough to stabilise the economic situation, and small enough to allow others to gain from it.

The significant changes which occur are managed by the power centres in Europe such as the French, the British and the Germans, who have the necessary leverage to stabilise the situation.